DVST-913: Gender, Development, and Globalization

Introduction to the Course

The "Gender, Development, and Globalization" course is a comprehensive interdisciplinary offering that delves into advanced theories across Gender Studies, Development Studies, and the impact of Globalization. Embedded within the Ph.D. program in Development Studies, this course encourages students to craft a research project that applies and critically examines the theoretical frameworks explored during lectures and readings, situated within their chosen thematic area. This course promises profound insights into gender dynamics within a globalized and transnational framework, making it invaluable for those aiming to influence policy, or pursue further research in the intersections of gender, development, and global studies. Participants will engage with both classical and contemporary debates, fostering a nuanced analytical skill set applicable in a range of professional settings, from policymaking and NGO work to academia and beyond.

Learning Objectives

Upon completing the "Gender, Development, and Globalization" course, students will be equipped to:

- Critically evaluate feminist theories and their application to understanding the complex dynamics of gender in development and the impact of globalization.
- Conduct interdisciplinary research that incorporates gender analysis, addressing key global issues such as economic policies, migration, environmental sustainability, and social justice.
- Develop comprehensive strategies for gender mainstreaming and promoting gender equality within development projects and policies, recognizing the importance of intersectionality.
- Engage effectively with contemporary debates and policy discussions on gender, development, and globalization, applying knowledge to advocate for gender justice in various professional contexts.
- Prepare for leadership roles in international development, academia, or policy analysis, with a strong foundation in gender-sensitive approaches to solving global challenges.
